

---

Subject: Asking women and men partners about violence

Posted by calemann on Tue, 06 Sep 2016 14:47:50 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Can a woman be asked the violence prevalence module, and her male partner, be asked the question on situations when it is justified to hit a woman, following the ethical and methodological guidelines for violence research, or does this put the woman at risk?

The survey questionnaire asks women a short module on IPV prevalence (using the WHO methodological/ethical guidelines..) and to their male partners, among other topics, ONLY the question about whether they justify IPV in certain situations (classic DHS question). The trainers raised the valid concern that if violent husbands ask/insist/harass their wives about "IF and what were they asked about IPV" they might be put at risk. I suggested that they include an instruction in this module, so that the interviewers informed the women that their husbands would be asked their opinion re: tolerance to IPV and if they asked them what were they asked, they could respond that "They asked me about my opinions on child rearing, parenting practices, family relations and health issues". They think that this might put women at risk anyway if they get too pressured and become nervous and disclose. Given that this question would be the only very proxy indicator to see if the violence prevention intervention we will be implementing has any influence in men's attitudes, based on your experience, do you think there is a risk for women in doing it this way and that the suggested script won't help? If so, are there any specific measures or guidelines we should take to ensure the woman's safety?

THANKS!

Clara

---