I am currently attempting to work with the 2012 DHS data for cooking fuel use in Haiti. I have a couple questions regarding this data. Does the urban and rural cooking fuel data include "camps" in this data.

When broken down by region, the camps seem to be separate and not included in the metropolitan area. When you look at the DHS wealth by residence data, it seems to indicate that 100% of the people residing in the metro area of Port-au-Prince are in the top three wealth quintiles, however if camps are included in the "urban" area then this cannot be reflective of the real situation. Do you have any insights into this?

Best,

Katie
