Thanks for your response and clarification. Yes, i was asking if i could select one woman when there were more than one woman in the household. The India report for NFHS4 says 601,509 households and 699,686 women were interviewed. Some households might not have any women, most as you suggest would have only one woman, and some would have more than one. In the latter case, with a merge, the household variables would be replicated for each woman in that household and i wanted to see if there was a way to take care of this replication. Thanks again.
